a mighty rush of waters ! I had seen a jare on which three hundred men had worked for three weeks before breaking it; but this looked worse: the snow-distanced river, hemmed in between precipices thirty feet high, and still further obstrucsed by the huge many rimber piled up level with the banks, was builing with impetuous rage. The timber itself was matted and interlaced in every conocivable manner : some pieces reared right on end, and the whole forming a mass fully thirty feet above the ordinary level of the water, but FINE Premises on the Praya, formerly occuwhich was now pouring over it. To make the matter worse. I found that only about ten men had arrived; the rost, having lost their way, did | not make their appearance until, evening. After a careful eramination I found that the mischief was caused by one stick lying across the channel and I though if that could be cut, the jam would break; but this was an operation of such extreme danger, that all the men hung back, and refused to attempt it. The only portion of the stick visible was in the centre of the stream, for the water, though pouring in masses over the sides of the inm did not overtop the middle. My idea was to fasten a rope to the stick, and then cut it nearly through; then, by means of a rope, all hunds could brook it, and all might be well. At length one of the men agreed to go down with me, but after working a short time, he became frightened, view of the Harbour, containing & Rooms, Kitchen and went on shore. All at once the stick broke, and Servants' Rooms. and the jam began slowly to move. But I soun any that though I was going very fast up the timber. I was going fast into the rapid, I immediately turned, and ran down, hoping that perhaps the timber might go through without brenking up; but before me, as I opened the rapid, I saw Billiard Rooms, a sight that at once took away from me all hope of going through alive.
